Abstract: In this article the author comments on the 2009 award of the Nobel Peace Prize to U.S. president Barack Obama. She takes the position that the prize was awarded in order to note that the U.S. was re-engaging with the world following unilateral actions taken by Obama's predecessor in office George W. Bush. The author contends that under Obama initiatives in a number of fields including the prevention of global warming and the promotion of human rights have faltered.
